In August 1962, August 1967, and June of 1968 Fr. Raymond V. Schoder, S.J., photographed ancient Greek archeological sites from the air. Most of these photographs were taken through the open door of a DC3 plane piloted by and belonging to the Hellenic Air Force. Of these photographs 140 were published in Wings over Hellas: Ancient Greece from the Air by Raymond V. Schoder, S.J. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1974).¹ In the introduction to his work Fr. Schoder explains the procedures employed in taking these photographs and the aim which motivated him:

to present all important excavated sites of ancient Greece, both mainland and islands and from Minoan to Roman times, from this advantageous point of view as a new aid to archeology and to historical studies as well as to visitors to the sites. . . . Only ancient sites are included, though many medieval centres are also meaningful from the air and I have photographed them also.

The photographic slides taken by Fr. Schoder during this project make up the bulk of the collection of slides listed below. Although ancient ruins are the predominant subject of the slides, there are several slides depicting contemporary cities from above. Interesting to note are the first three slides showing the technique which Fr. Schoder used to photograph from the air. The slides are maintained numerically in the order in which they were transferred to the Archives. Except for the first three slides, the arrangement is alphabetic by name of site. The slide identifications preserved below are those of Fr. Schoder.

¹This same book was also printed in England as Ancient Greece from the Air (London: Thames and Hudson, 1974), in Germany as Das antike Griechenland aus der Luft, in Holland as La Grèce antique vue du ciel: les sites archéologiques photographiques d'avion, and in Belgium as Hellas in vogelvlucht: Het oude Griekenland vanuit de lucht gezien.
